We've added a new dimension to baby-sitting, and our youngest daughter figures it's the best one yet. Finally she's in the business. I've done a bit of muttering over the years of paying sitters that I'd sure be glad when the money started flowing the other way. That happened long ago, of course, but our No. 4 began to wonder if any of the jobs ever would come to her instead of to her sisters.

She was the only one available, though, when there was a call for someone to take care of a four-month-old cutie visiting his grandparents' home while his parents attended a wedding in the family.

At one point she telephoned me to say he'd only take his bottle if she was standing up. I told her I guessed she'd have to do her sitting standing up for a while. She did, and wound up on fine terms with her small charge.

But there were other aspects to this job that made it a definite addition to our saga of the baby-sitter, you see, used to be our main baby-sitter when she was a high school student.

So, I told my daughter, if he gave her a hard time it was poetic justice — she wasn't always particularly cooperative for his mother.

And there was a final flip. It turned out that two babies were involved in one of the two nights of sitting, because another relative arrived for the wedding.

So our daughter found a friend to help her and, you guessed it, she too had been baby-sat by the young mother visiting here.

I'd better figure out a moral. Maybe something like babies return to roost for the wails of the sons are visited upon the daughters.
