SYNOPSIS.

At 14 years of age, Admiral Sir Peter Hawkins, a noble, rich, and powerful man, married Lady Arabella, a girl of noble birth and high position. The lady was a beautiful girl, and her beauty and high position made her a great asset to the admiral. The admiral was a very successful man, and his wealth and power made him a very influential man in the world. The lady was a very intelligent girl, and her intelligence and beauty made her a very popular girl. The admiral and the lady were very much in love, and their love was a very strong bond between them. The admiral was a very kind man, and his kindness and love made him a very popular man. The lady was a very gentle girl, and her gentleness and love made her a very popular girl. The admiral and the lady were very much in love, and their love was a very strong bond between them.

CHAPTER IX.

Lady Arabella Stormont was as good as her word; for that day, two months, Sir Peter was put upon trial for the first time. The lady was a very beautiful girl, and her beauty and high position made her a great asset to the admiral. The admiral was a very successful man, and his wealth and power made him a very influential man in the world. The lady was a very intelligent girl, and her intelligence and beauty made her a very popular girl. non's arms, she accepted the protection of a relative of his, one Sir Thomas Whitall, a deceased gentleman, and went to live at a small town near York until the fastest, when she would be called upon to the chief seat for the prosecution. Great stories were immediately put forth that Sir Thomas Vernon was deeply smitten with Arabella's charms, and that, after a visit with Mrs. Whitall to Vernon Court she looked very kindly on Sir Thomas. All this might be true, and Sir Thomas might have felt himself that he had won her favor; but, knowing that she did not, he did not credit her with any sincere desire to be kind to Sir Thomas Vernon, although she might make him think so, for her own purposes. I suspected, however, a motive deeper than any other. In any matter connected with Sir Thomas Vernon, over whom was the next heir to Giles; Sir Thomas was extremely rich, and not likely to be long-lived; and, if, by merely telling what had happened, Lady Arabella could enter her resentment, which was deep and furious, against Giles, and at the same time greatly benefit Overton, I think she would not have weighed Giles life at a penny. My doubts, whose faith in human nature was angelic, in her belief in ultimate good, prayed and sought Arabella to leave the country before the trial came off, but Arabella would not do so.

CHAPTER X.

You are a child and a chit. Giles Vernon contemplated doing me the greatest wrong a man can do to a woman. Do you think I shall let him go unpunished? If so, how shall I do you know Arabella Stormont?

CHAPTER XI.

Then I, from loyalty to Giles, and not from any hope I had from Lady Arabella, went to her and made my appeal. She heard all my prayers, and about the slightest sign of relenting, playing with her lap-dog the while. At last I said to her: "Tell me, at least, who is to be benefited by the conviction of Giles Vernon? Not you, certainly, for you will be ruined and ruined by it. The person dearest to me in the world," she replied, "the person I love better than my life or my soul," and then, as if she had admitted too much, she stopped, turned pale, and seemed almost disconcerted. She had, in truth, admitted too much. The person she had ever loved better than her soul was Philip Overton.

CHAPTER XII.

I had the opportunity to leave her, and I went off by myself to think over the strange motive which had been revealed to me. Arabella's infatuation for Overton had always been abnormal, indeed with madness and could have been a case of love web around Giles Vernon than in making him fall so madly in love with Arabella Stormont? Giles had promptly responded my trial, but he had not been a fugitive from justice and a deserter from the naval service. He reported to York, after having duly reported to the admiralty, and was placed immediately under arrest. The Hawkshaw, my Daphne and I remained in Scarborough during the two dreadful months that passed before the trial came off. Sir Peter really got leave from the admiralty for as long a time as he wanted, and money, but the example of the felicity in which Daphne and I lived, might not be without its effect upon the jury that tried Giles.

offer of money to assist in his defense came from many quarters, and from several ladies—two in especial, her grace of Anchester and Mrs. Trenchard. Lady Arabella, however, claimed the privilege of bearing the expenses of the trial out of her private fortune, which was large. Sir Peter and she had it hot and heavy, he desiring to contribute, and for one of the few times in his life, he carried his point, and he had two good reasons for being brought from London to assist Giles in his defense, besides another one in York itself. CHILD EVINCED REAL HEROISM.

Pathetically Brave in Hour That Brings Terror to Us All.

A pathetic story of a child's heroism is told by a Dublin gentleman. Recently he proposed to drive with his wife to the beautiful Glavin coast, where, some four years old, he told him to get ready to accompany them. The child's countenance fell and the father said: "Don't you want to go, Willie?" "The little lip quivered, but the child answered, 'Yes, papa, if you wish.' The child was strangely silent during the drive, and when the carriage drove up to the entrance he clung to his mother's side and looked up in her face with pathetic wistfulness. The party alighted and walked among the graves and along the tree-shaded avenues, looking at the sculptures of the great restful places of the dwellers in the beautiful city of the dead. After an hour or so thus spent, they returned to the carriage, and the father, lifting his little son to his seat, said: "The child looked surprised, drew a breath of relief, and asked: "Why, am I going back with you?" "Of course you are; why not?" "I thought when they took little boys to the cemetery they left them there," said the child.

Now It Is Different.
