The Polo mark gives men a chance to flaunt something other than their own initials

Signatures can add spark to wardrobe

When men sign their John Hancock it's bigger than life. But when the time comes to add a signature or two to their wardrobe it's usually done as discreetly as possible.

There are some obvious marks of distinction. The Polo emblem clearly stands out on ties or the Alligators of Chemise Lacoste represent the company on the torso. But in most instances, designers and companies don't give men much to flaunt.

What they do have, however, is their initials. And ego-minded or style-conscious, most men have a thing or two that bares their mark.

Cuff links are obvious eye catchers, with tie tacks following close behind. Also on the engravable side are bracelets, attache cases and luggage. Shirt pockets, handkerchiefs and coat linings often serve for embroidered monograms and shoe buckles occasionally take in their owner's insignia.

The ego trip for men is their thing. They are not showing how much money they have via signature handbags or sweaters. They are merely wearing their ego on their shirt sleeves.
