

'Go to your room' no longer a threat

Fortunately for girl kids as well as boy kids, furniture manufacturers are discovering that they are short adults and not just short.

Once upon a time, a little girl's bedroom just had to be pink and ruffy. Nowadays mothers shouldn't weep if their little daughter wants baseball bats or horse paintings all over the walls.

Likewise little boys all don't have to be sailors or soldiers in their own rooms.

Children are small, so furniture has to be scaled to their size. Manufacturers still do this, to a certain extent.

But many budgets, probably most in fact, cannot afford to buy two sets of furniture per child as the child outgrows the "youth" furniture and becomes a young adult at about junior high school age.

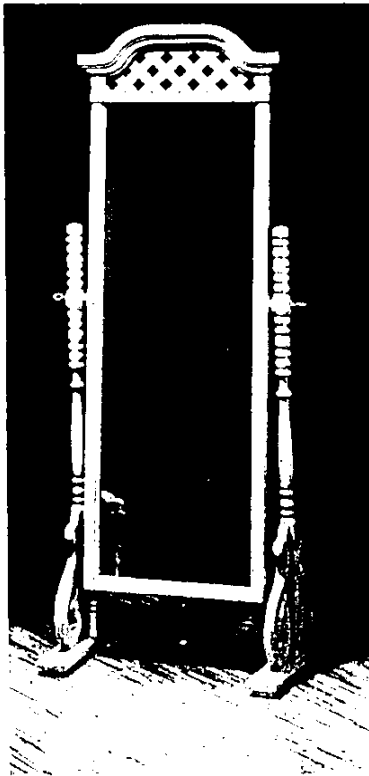

Consequently more bedroom furnishings aimed at the young market has great growth potential. Not only will it "grow" well style wise, but sizewise, too.

Furniture modules are giving parents the ability to furnish their children's rooms for the childhood duration.

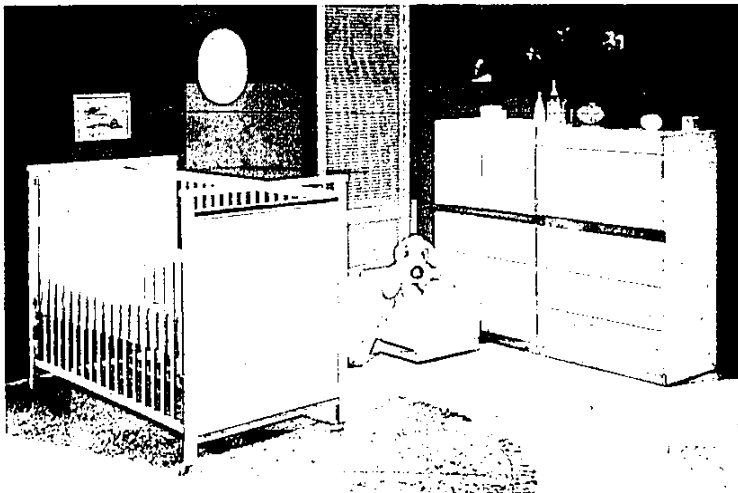

Simple furniture that can make the age and possibly a change of room size transition are the most sought today.

All-in-one units have become increasingly popular because of the space saving feature. Also a unit which can house a wardrobe, small closet, desk, bookshelves, and still give the child a hide-away lofty bunk bed will please both parents and child.

If, as in the case of some furniture groups, it can make the transition one day from a rugged boys' or girls room to a second recreation home bedroom the lifespan is even longer.
