"We even share the same color hair which made our color viewpoints similar and harmonious, too," he laughed.

The exterior of the home is French classical, almost Regency, he explained. Some of the interior furnishings have a French accent, too.

Antique French fruitwood armoire doors serve as a camouflage for a passway between the small dining room and the kitchen on the other side.

A carved cyprus capital forms the base for the living room's large glass coffee table. It too, has a French tone, as it once crowned a column of a New Orleans home built before the Civil War.

Other unusual touches make the home special.

The living room fireplace moulding for instance, came from a Grand Haven, Mich., home built in 1848.

An exquisite Chippendale lowboy greets callers in the foyer and two handsome emerald green chests add color to the basically monochromatic living room scheme.

Corner cabinets, built with antique English armoire doors, conceal storage areas for glassware and china in the dining room.

Another dining room storage and display feature is bronze, brass and glass etagere designed and manufactured by Parmelee's new company to be called Addenda.

"These clients were immensely encouraging people. The sense of cooperation which ran through the house between the client, the builder (C.E. Rayman and Son of Troy) and myself was wonderful.

"They might have been able to talk me into anything, they were so nice, but fortunately we agreed on almost everything anyway," Parmelee said.
