

They cultivate creativity

The name of this game is creative dramatics, and the kids taking it seriously (in a lighthearted way) are, hopefully, learning to stay creative and inventive. It's the brainchild of Dr. Sue Martin who makes the long trip from her Birmingham home to the University of Windsor to teach a course in dramatics. Last summer, she conducted a play group with her two children and two of their playmates. Object: to encourage self-expression and cultivate creativity, which she says children lose through some home and school experiences. One other thing she also obviously encourages — the kids had a barrel of fun.
