Moral perspectives Society needs new morality

Two men on "involuntary vacation" had a heated exchange because one resented the other's working without full pay. He replied, "If the company goes down the tube, we will both be in the same unemployment line." The argument did not illustrate good versus evil but a conflict of two views of morality.

The old economics meant view-sary proceedings (witness clogged courts) and a fighting stance (witness guns and wars). An even older morality means waiting for solutions from higher powers which we know will only result in more bureaucratic inefficiency.

OUR SOCIETY will weather the economic crisis but the question is whether we will be a better or worse society. The opportunity presented is to grow in our moral thinking so interdependence is treated as the central fact of our moral life.

"If the company goes down the tube..." When we admit, not that we might but that we will be together in troubles, we will work together in constructive efforts. Morality is found in relationships.

ing the competitor as an enemy. Most workers felt the boss was a foe. Rugged individualism enabled pioneers to conquer the vast plains, make homes out of wilderness, create industrial power and build a noble life. But what was moral then is immoral now.

The dominant fact today is interdependence. It is as important to respect dependence as independence. Weaponry or resources in one place are the business of people in another place. We easily think of "one world."

THE CHALLENGE is to think this way in everyday communities of home and work. Only when we find the vitality of community will we solve our problems regarding crime, loneliness, education, ecology and even reverence. When we see we really are in the same boat, we will act on problems.

To be as moral as our forefathers, we need a new morality. They had to strive to be unique at home and work so individualism was their guide. Relationships came automatically, whether desired or not.

With our mobility, we each bring speciality to any gathering but must strive to build relationships.

Individualism is a morality which continues old power struggles (with senseless strikes), adver-
