Although I'm the member of our family who should, by vocation at least, be the one concerned with the rights of women, I find our daughters getting into the act quite often these days.

Our high school sophomore and her math class offer a case in point.

She has kept up a running verbal battle all this school year with that teacher, whom she describes as a Male Chauvinist Pig of the first order. I should point out, though, that she has done some mighty class switching to get into the one taught by this particular MCP.

ANYWAY, I'LL LET her catalog her grievances.

The textbook has three male writers and one female," she reports. "When he agrees with the book, he commends Albert, Alfred and Ray. When he disagrees, he blames it on Mary."

"Then one day a pamphlet came out on women engineers. He stapled it to the bulletin board—upside-down. If two girls talk before class, it's because they're 'women.' Two guys talking before class get no comment whatsoever."

To add insult to injury, she tells me, she has to do her work from an MCP textbook.

On two pages, she points out, there are 11 story problems, nine about males and two about females. "The ones about guys have them in sports, travel and studies," she wails. "With the girls it's why Susie was late when she walked and how Lola's pet monkey can climb."

HER OLDER SISTER, pursuing math studies on the college level, was delighted with one of her textbooks. She found a really liberated problem involving the travel time of a young physician making HER rounds.

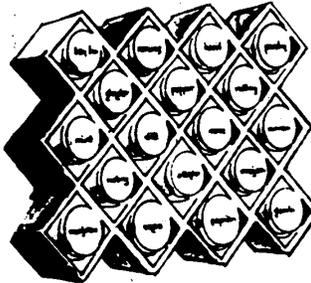

But she too has met up with a bit of MCPism.

Because her school has mainly male students, she found herself the only woman in a chemistry class. So when in one day's classwork, she had to make computations about a chemist and HIS results, she felt it her feminist duty to cross off the word "his" and substitute "her."

When the professor passed back the papers, he made no comment, she reports. But he made up for it at the end of the class.

"We seem to have a woman's libber here," he announced as our daughter turned red.

"I would suggest to that student that on the day of the exam she pray to God that SHE will help her get a passing grade." —Margaret Miller
