The outdoors: One big science lab

Summer and the great outdoors; a child-pleasing combination, and an opportunity for learning. The outdoors is one big science lab and you don't have to be a scientist to help your child learn and discover. Your part is to provide the child with the opportunity to get acquainted with nature and to encourage his questions and curiosity," says Janet Voorheis, Oakland County Extension Home Economist, Michigan State University Cooperative Extension Service.

Something as simple as a walk through the woods, along a creek or riverbank or across a vacant lot will turn up a hundred wonders. Take the time to stop and look at pretty rocks or funny bugs, sniff the flowers—even if they're just weeds to you—listen to the calls and songs of birds, watch a bee working in a flower, touch a fuzzy leaf, see how close you can get to a turtle sunning on a half-sunk log. Use a magnifying glass to enter a whole new world. Look at salt and sugar crystals, leaves, fabric, rocks, insects, wood, flowers, grass, hair.

YOU MAY NOT know the answers to all your child's questions, but you can encourage him to ask them and you can use them as springboards to further talk, thought and investigation. Let them lead you on an expedition to the library or look for the answer in your home reference books. You'll help the child satisfy his desire to know, and acquaint him with ways he can use to find out on his own.

Collections are one way youngsters can bring nature home to study. Children are natural collectors of pretty stones, feathers, pine cones, weed seed pods and the like, and they enjoy watching caterpillars or tadpoles as they grow and mature into adult butterflies and frogs.

For an all-summer project, set aside a part of your vegetable or flower garden for the children and let them plant what they want. Whether the end product is a plate of vegetables or a handful of marigolds, your child will have had the joy of caring for a living thing. And the learning he'll carry away from the project will be immense.
