Drama helps homes

More and more of today's homes have drama built into them even before they are sold

Developers who always seemed so conservative next to architects, have begun trading on that sacred ground called design and have come up with some interesting home features

When new houses cost anywhere from $41,000 to $100,000 in developments, a homeowner expects something to be built in before he gets there

Their expectations have been fulfilled by many of the area's leading developers who've learned that people will pay for drama if it's in the right places

Sunken living rooms seem mild now, compared with two-story living rooms with sky-light options. Complete library galleries or greenhouses also can set a mood that seems worth the price

Where developers haven't used imagination, the interior designers step in to create their own brand of drama

This type ranges from dramatic track lighting to giant graphics painted on mirrored walls to expand the space
