

BRIDGE

Defensive card play is one of the more difficult phases of bridge. A new player quickly learns that he can discard a high card to indicate he wants his partner to lead a suit. The more difficult aspect is the definition of a high card. Also it is not always clear when discarding whether partner or declarer gains the most.

West led the ace of spades. A ten can be a small card if all smaller cards are exposed. The queen is a high card, but when discarded it denies the holding of the king.

In the hand in the diagram, East demonstrated some lack of consideration of these facts. The bidding warrants little comment. South chose to make the sacrifice early and East was more impressed with his five hearts than his partner's cue bid.

Declarer ruffed the opening lead and made a poor choice by winning the club ace to lead a second club in the hope of using the heart ten to ruff the third club.

This gave East his chance to error. On the second club, he discarded his "high" diamond eight to show the ace. When South finally led the diamond six, West could see all the smaller cards. He thought his partner's "low" card indicated he did not have the ace.

West played the king and the ace went on the same trick. One of declarer's losers had disappeared. East made two mistakes. Obviously he thought the eight had to be a high card. More important, however, is the fact that he had no need to try to show the ace for the defense would have located the card in due course without the discard.
