Slinky sleepwear and the wasp waist

What do you do with a slinky, sexy gown after you've worn it to a few parties? Sleep in it! That, after all, is what it was designed for.

Gowns by lingerie manufacturer Lucie Ann are all non-clinging nylon in a greyed chocolate brown. Bonwit Teller's designer salon manager Janice Morse found them in the lingerie department along with some other interesting items including a waist cincher which the models decided to try on.

Amidst gasps of "I can't breathe" and much giggling, the waist cincher was pulled, tugged and hooked in place. Designed to be worn under a garment, it guarantees the appearance of a tiny waist.

Popular in the late 40s, along with the "wasp waist" was the Merry Widow bra and the garter belt. We found those, too, among the new fall lingerie at Bonwit, along with matching sets of dance pants, camisole tops and petticoats designed by Anne Klein.

Part of the new "frankly sexy" approach to dressing, they are a far cry from the current underlayment freedom of no-bra, bikini panty and panty hose.
