

Freedman found a fight — on seating

Gerald A. Freedman, who lives in Farmington Hills, was involved in one of the few fights at the otherwise calm '76 Democratic National Convention.

Freedman, who attended the convention as an alternate delegate pledged to Gov. Jimmy Carter, became involved in a battle with both the Michigan delegation and with the boards of spectators who turned New York's Madison Square Garden to get better treatment for alternate delegates.

Usually at national conventions, the alternate delegates are seated right behind the regular delegates, Freedman explained. But this time, because the size of Madison Square Garden was so limited, the alternate delegates were seated way away from their delegates.

"BUT OUR biggest problem was that all the people standing in the aisle of the Garden blocked our view, all the conversation going on, while people were making speeches made it impossible for us to hear what was going on, and a lot of people who were merely guests came into our seating area and took our seats so none of us could sit down," Freedman said.

Freedman wound up leading a group of alternates who organized themselves into a solidarity watch, keeping strangers out of their seats and asking people standing in the aisle to move along. By the last day of the convention, their efforts were clearly successful.

He hope we can solve these problems at our next convention," Freedman remarked. "Otherwise, we'll have to move the alternates to the floor of the ballot along with the other huddled masses."
