m.m.memos

By MARGARET MILLER

We bought a couple of pomegranates to masai with a few dozen others in the chancel of our church for the Christmas season, and then we had to decide what kind of a dedication we should use.

Let's say they're in thankfulness for another Christmas together, our No. 2 daughter, who is a Christian, said.

That sounded just fine to me—echoed my own feelings to a T.

We had been afraid this would be the Christmas of the first break in the ranks and I was determined to accept the inevitable with good grace and good cheer.

Our older daughter, who had moved several states away to a new job a few months ago, had been watching her university's football team win game after game and was smelling roses and thinking of a Rose Bowl victory.

We had wanted to consider using travel time and money for the trip to Pasadena she'd missed for three years, and we didn't see how we could do anything other than encourage her to go west.

Still, even as I told the other girls we wouldn't be going, I knew we would have to be in the ever-on-home-for-Christmas tradition sometime. I hated the thought of that gap in the family on the morning of Dec. 25.

But then came the word that she'd check ed plane reservations for both Michigan at Christmas and California at New Years, and she'd been working a lot of overtime and was sure she could manage both trips.

And that was followed by a letter about the enjoyment of Christmas in her new home—but the main thing is I'm coming to the Rose Bowl three weeks from now.

So we decided this last week before Christmas includes a trip to the airport.

There will be a chance to trim the tree together, and our time-honored customs of Christmas morning will go on as in other years and we'll even manage a Christmas dinner together.

And I know very well there soon will be a Christmas when the break in the circle will happen.

I'm determined to accept the inevitable with good grace and good cheer.
Some other year.
