Experts discuss computer's role

Could a doctor in California conceivably treat you in an emergency on the basis of information stored in Michigan? The answer is probably, "Yes, someday."

"This and other potential use of computerized information will be discussed in a free public lecture at Madonna College, Livonia, on Monday, Jan. 17 at 7:30 p.m.

Dealing with the use and misuse of the electronic computer, the dis-ussion, "Information and the Public," will be led by Dr. Charlotte Neuhauer, chairman of the business administration department at Madonna.

A graduate of DePauw University, she earned graduate degrees at Wayne State University—and has had extensive experience in systems design and programming.

Dr. Neuhauer will discuss what the computer can and cannot do and comment on the misuse of the computer as an invasion of privacy, in larceny and computer fraud.

A panel of experts will join her to discuss the potential of the computer as tool of the medical profession, the business world, and in criminal justice systems.

Guest panelists will be Robert Coffey, director of data processing at St. John Hospital, William McMillan, director of data processing at Northwest United Realty Company, and Robert Snell, chief of the Bloomfield Township Police Department.

The lecture is one in a series presented by Madonna College in cooperation with the Michigan Council for the Humanities, dealing with "People Power in Public Decisions."

The lecture will be held in the science lecture hall on the Madonna campus at 3660 Schoolcraft.

"Maybe we won't have school tomorrow," our high school sophomore suggested with some enthusiasm as the predictions of a winter storm emanated from the weathercasters.

Her high school senior sister, although not exactly delighted about snow and winter, still thought the day off from school sounded good.

And of course their college-type sister had no major objections—she's one of those strange types who really seems to enjoy the various manifestations of winter.

My own thoughts were mainly the here-we-go-again variety. The more I live with the fluffy white stuff, the less beautiful it looks to me, and I saw no possibility of school being out for me.

But as usual we made it through the "six-to-eight-inches-with-high-windsand-falling-temperatures" routine.

Miss Snow-lover got the shoveling stint underway as we woke up to a blovy white world the next morning. She attacked the drifts with sufficient force to permit three cars to get out our long driveway and head in the direction of their respective destinations.

Meanwhile, a couple of ears were glued to the radio reporting school closings, while, at our upstairs window, eyes were trained on the school parking lot across the way. Buses there were lighted but not moving, our reporters said.

Finally came the radio word that our particular high school would not open, and the bus lights began blinking out.

The non-students then became shovlers. They found the task challenged their energies to the full.

By nightfall, despite more snowfall and drifting, there was a driveway ready to receive the returning vehicles and a homes ready for three drivers who exchanged slip-and-slide stories.
