Getting it together

Conflicts can improve our love relationships

In spite of the old saw that claims that "opposites attract." almost every-body is looking for a mate with compatible interests and values. The reason is purely practical. To the young mate-shopper, successful marriage is thought to depend on harmony and a hand of the petting acquaimted, courting process is aimed at discovering how similar we are. Discussing politics, rapping about religion, we are testing each other.

By exposing our values to each other we are checking for a positive or negative reactions we get, the more encouraged we are to invest further in the relationship in the relationship and the same and the sa the belief that lovers will be able to change each other after they are married.

Most important, this pattern of artificial harmony and flight from differentiage, and ultimately, a divorce.

But, what's even more trage is that it is all based on wrong assumptions. Differences don't have to be treated as poisonous to a love relationship, in fact, they can be the most direct path toward intimacy and permanence.

The key is in how they are handled, when they are openly discussed they become the perfect vehicle for a deep-runderstanding of each other. When the problems they cause are successfully resolved, the relationship is strengthened and increases in value.

SUCCESSFUL intimates actually welcome differences because they have seen how working out real conflicts actually improves their love relationship. Each difference is seen as an opportunity to become even closer, more knowledgeable about each other.

more knowledgeapte about cache other.

Behind our compatible facades are those feelings which are hardest to admit, the ones we don't accept in ourselves. And those are the very same feelings which we need to have understood and accepted by our lover.

It's a pattern that's so old that it seems like the natural way of things. And that means that breaking the pat-tern requires an extra effort and a lot of courage.
