CHAPTER, I—Continued.

When the taxtab deposited us in mont of the house I glanced hastly up and down the road. There was another cab at the east end of the street, but I could not discern if it were approaching me or statuonary. I opened the front door quickly and admitted my companion, then preceded her up the uncarpeted stairs to my little apartment on the ton floor.

Had I given the pursuers a clue by renppearance?

I watched for a few moments longer, but the vehicle did not return and I dismissed the iden as folly. After all, New York was a civilized city, and I could be sure of the girl's safety behind the street door lock and hat on yapariment door. So I refused to yield to the impulse to go back and, sauce 'myself that she was all right. I must find a hotel and get a good night's sleep.

danger was threatening Jacqueliae. I could not been the suspense of waiting till morning.

And as I ran I thought I heard the patter of the dog's feet, packing mine. I was rounding the conten of Tenth struct now, and again the folly of my behavior struck home to me. I stopped and tried to think. Was it some in-struct that was taking me back, or was it the remembrance of Jacqueline's beauty? Was it, not the desire to see her, to ask her about the ring?

I had ectually swung around when I heard the ghostly patter of the feet again close at my side. I made my decision in that instant and hurried will(1) on my course back toward the spartment house.

When at last I found my door my hands were trembling so that I could hardly fit the key latto the lock.

I bounded up the stairs. But on the floor story I had to pause to get my breath, and, then I dared not center. I listened autistical. There was no sound from within.

The two rooms that I occupied tree separated only be a certain which fell saling on a wooden pode, disclosing two feet between the top of it and the sulmy on a wooden pode, disclosing two feet between the top of it and the celling. The rooms were time actually one, and even that might have been called small, for the bed in the rear room was not a dozen paces from the door.

I listened for the breathing of the steeping girl. If I could hear her breathe, I thought I would go quietly way and find a hotel in which in sleep, I listened minute after minute, but I could not here a sound.

At last I put my mouth to the keyhole and spoke to her. "Jacquellate!" And then quite loudly: "Jacquellate!" And then dute loudly: "Jacquellate!" And then dute loudly: "Jacquellate!" And left on the mantel of the bedroom. I heard that, and it must have been

Once more twentured:

"Jacqueline! Jacqueline!"

There was not the smallest answering site within. And so, with shaking fingers. I turned the key.

The room was completely dark, except for a little patch of light high up on the bedroom wall, which came, through the hole the workmen had made when they began demolishing Unitedey Thirdees.

A correspondent suggests that the origin of the "unitedey thirdeen" superstition is to be found in the easting lots by Hunan; to discoper a "locky day" for the destruction of the Jewa. The 18th was certainly a most untoy turiate selection in this case, and the story was so popular in [the middle ages that it may really have given rise to the superstition.
