Domesticating daughters, I decided long ago, is a matter really beyond a mother's powers.

You can insist on a modicum of room-cleaning, and watch your standards get lower and lower as the hassles get more wearing.

You can assign chores in the kitchen and the house and the garden and hope that the pride in seeing them done will sometime become more important than the begrudged time.

You can instruct a bit in the arts of cooking and sewing and sometimes enthusiasm is engendered. But if it isn't, there's little more you can do to fan the flame.

No question about it, you can lead your young filly to a view of homemaking, but you can't make her enjoy it.

So it's with utter amazement that I've watched over the last few months as our No. 2 daughter, preparing to become a bride in the fall, has suddenly turned domestic.

She who could hardly boil the proverbial water moved to an apartment and was like magic not only making cakes and grilling steaks but actually preparing meals for her future in-laws.

She who had dwelt happily in a pigeon was talking about the need to get the apartment cleaned.

She who couldn't be persuaded to stitch a split seam in her jeans asked for my old sewing machine and has made herself two becoming dresses.

And the greatest shock came as she and her fiancé completed purchase of a house and she started talking about the garden space and what they would plant.

Surely this couldn't be the same daughter who so recently didn't know the difference between the flowers and the weeds on home turf.

The light dawns, of course. What a mother can't do, a prospective husband can. Maybe, though, a little groundwork was there all the time. I'd like to think so.

At last a top cooking school for EVERYONE!

Here is where everybody can forget their books & learn both new & traditional dishes — & exciting ways to set a table — directly from Neil Benedict & her staff of experts.
