

On 13th birthday Synagogue contemplates future

By JUDITH BERNE

AS EARLY as 1969, the temple bought 5 1/2 acres on Walnut Lake Road west of Farmington as it looked ahead to future growth. A small cottage on the property was used for an office until a new building was completed three years ago. The new facility consists of a sanctuary and temple office. Religious school continues to be held at rented facilities.

And for the temple, like the child, that means growth and development — if it so chooses.

Eight families helped spawn a new temple back in 1966 with the idea of creating a small, personalized Reform Jewish congregation in the Birmingham-West Bloomfield-Pontiac area. It was first called The New Temple.

Services were held in member homes and then in the Birmingham Unitarian Church with religious school held in local schools in West Bloomfield.

And like many adolescents marking the rites of passage from child to adult, the temple must consider its next step.

"We are going into adolescence and adulthood," said founding Rabbi Ernst J. Conrad last week.

Now, KOL AMI's membership of 280 families is rapidly approaching the 300-limit cited in its constitution. And therein lies the new adolescent's problem.

"Our desire is to remain small enough to stay in touch with our people," Conrad said. "A large segment of our congregation hates to give up the closeness."

At the same time, Conrad is looking at the economic realities of spiraling costs and the need to landscape and add a social hall.

And then should a temple exclude those who want to be part of it?

And what about having the ability to expand services to include activities for senior citizens and singles?

More than half its membership are West Bloomfield residents, Conrad said, and the temple works hard at "trying to be a part of the community in which we are."

CONRAD IS optimistic that the congregation will be able to plot a path with the aid of its new members and
