"So," the tyl smiled a little, "yon would betray your business friends in order to make a bit of money formed than that for—"

"Thank you," she interrupted, her voice cold. "I don't think I'd trust your sagacity very far, Robert. Good-night."

She turned from him and, was gone, dancing through the great rooms like a true Columbia.

Midnight neared, and brought a concern to many: the Midnight Magquer had gained his name by invariably appearing a moment or two before the stroke of twelve. Jachin Fell, who divided his time between enjoying about, money a measurer, perceived that, Joseph Maillard was watching the time with nanlety.

A large man, stern and a bit scorning to the typical banker, efficient, devold of all sentiment. Anuscub by the man's evident uneasness, Jachin Fell kept bim in view while the moments dranged. One might have thought that the little gray man was studying the financier as an entomologist studies a butterly, on a pin.

Shortly before tweive Columbian pirouetted up, to Fell and accepted the arm he offered her. They were for the moment alone, in a corner of the humon and the service of the moment of the content of t

The Bandit.

Joseph Mailliard's library was on the ground floor of the house; It was a scalate and stately room, aid was invariably sinut off to itself. Not even tonight, of all nights, was stighrown open with the remeinder of the house. Here Maillard summoned half a dozen of his particular cronics and triends, after the stroke of mindight had assured, him that there was no danger to be expected from the bandit. His son was not among the house. The half dozen, seer jurily all elderly men, and, with the cogotion of Jachin Fell, all were mon if prominent affairs.

About the table grouned Maillard elderly men, and, with the 'reepton of Jachin Fell, all were men' f promitent anfairs.

About the table grouped Maillard and his guests. Maillard, standing before a small wall safe that flanked the open hearth, lifted his silver goblet, asteam with beads. The moment for which he had been waiting was here; he launched his little thunder-blit with an air of satisfied importance. "My friends, I have a concession to make!" he announced. "Today I re-elved a note from the Midnight Masquer stating that he would be with usthis evening, presumably at the hour of midnight, his usual time." A These words brought an Inslant sience. "Not a sound, if you please," he warned, his voice thin and nasal—obviously disguised. "I trust that none of you gentlenen is arned, because I am very guick on the trigger. A very pleasant surprise, Mailland't You'd given me up, chr." For an instant no one spoke. Then Maillard moved slightly, moved his hand toward a button, set in the wall cear the safe. The voice of the bandict reped out at him like thin stee!

"Quiet, you fool! If you touch that button—"

"Quiet, you loon"
Maillard stiffened, and gripped the
The bandit howed slightly, and addressed the gathering in a

"Then you are not sware that Mr. Fell is a man of large affairs?" The bandita white teeth fisched in a smile. "He is a modest man, this attorney! And a dangerous man also, I assure you. But come. Mr. Fell, Fil not herray you."

Jachia Fell obviously did not appreciate the pleasantry. His shy and wondering features assumed a set and hardened look.

"Whoever you are." he responded, a subtle click of anger in his tone, "you shall be punished for this."

"For what, Mr. Fell? For knowing too much of your private affairs?" The bandit laughed. "Fear not—I am only an amateur at this game, fortunately? So do your worst, and my blessing upon you! Now, geatlemen, titally withdraw a few paces. All but you, Maillard; The not through with you yet."

The automatic pistol, gestured; under its meance everyone obeyed the command. For the calm assurance of the bandit made it seem extremely likely that he would use the weapon without computetion. The men withdrew toward the far end of the room, where a word from the aviator halted them. Maillard rendined standing where he was.

The Masquer advanced to the table and gathered the heap of money and where a form the group of men, burd if the man when you will have the kindness to turn wround and open the wail safe behind you. And don't touch the button."
