

The Prize-Winners

Those who win the big prizes in financial affairs are those who sacrifice the PRESENT for the FUTURE.

Think that over carefully. Think of the rich people you know. See if there wasn't a time when they had hard sledding. Ask them about it. They will tell you. Most of them are proud of their early struggles. There is no royal road to success. Once in a while some one makes a lucky strike, but a fortune made on a gamble is likely to go the same way. Steady saving, careful investment and the support of a good bank, these things count.

When Trouble Comes

By ELLA SAUNDERS

Copyright, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.

Sawyer was ruined. The combine that he had hoped to smash had smashed him beyond repair. He had hung up the telephone in his office for the last time.

Mechanically he put on his hat and went out. Everybody knew. The clerks and typists had received their two weeks' pay in advance. With notice. There was a subtle change in their demeanor. They no longer bent over their work when Sawyer passed. They were gossiping insolently about him. The office boy forgot to open the door. Why should he? He was no longer in Sawyer's employment.

The negro elevator boy grinned at Sawyer when he took him down. Sawyer was finished. There was probably no last tip in Sawyer's pocket for him. There wasn't. Sawyer passed out into the hall.

His eyes lit up as a beautiful, fashionably dressed lady came toward him. This was Miss Eaton—a very intimate friend, perhaps his most intimate. There was a strange look on her face. "What's this I hear about you, Jim?" she asked.

"It's true, whatever you've heard, Helen," Sawyer answered. "I'm blown up, finished."

She stared at him incredulously. "And what are you going to do about me?" she asked.

Sawyer drew her into an alcove, away from prying eyes. "Listen, Helen, I've five thousand left," he said. "I might raise five thousand more. Will you come away with me to that little paradise of an Isle, we've spoken of?"

Miss Eaton tossed her head contemptuously. "Well, I guess not," she answered. "No love in a tropical cottage for mine, thanks!"

And Sawyer quailed before her contempt. This struck him more bitterly than anything in the world.

"What are you going to do for me?" Miss Eaton continued. "How's my allowance going to be?"

Sawyer turned on her fiercely. "It better be," he answered. "You've swallowed every penny of mine you're going to have."

She began pleading, threatening. Sawyer cast her off with contempt. She flung a vicious punch at him and passed out of the hall.

Sawyer went to the telephone booth and called up his wife's lawyers. "Tell Mrs. Sawyer that her suit will not be contested," he said. "This is James Sawyer speaking."

He went home to his lonely apartment. It was three months since his wife had found out about Miss Eaton and left him. But Miss Eaton was only the last of a long series of losses. He had been married eighteen years. At first he and Maria had loved each other. But that was when he was a fifteen-dollar clerk and they had a three-room apartment in union. Those days seemed very far to look back upon now. He had been a partner with her there then at a time afterward when they lived in luxury. They had been so fond of him that they only child—Tom—who had turned out bad and disappeared years before.

That had severed the last bond between them. Sawyer had been surprised when Maria left him. He had not thought that she would turn out as she had. But he had never thought she had known. But what a fool a man was to follow false fires!

He sat alone in his study. The servants were expecting notice, there was only the man and man relationship between them now. He had always known there was hate beneath the man's smooth exterior.

Well, there was only one thing for it. A man could cut off alone, and Sawyer had not even a dog. He opened a little drawer in his desk, took out something shining—some one was in the hall. He replaced it hastily. The door opened. Maria came forward. "You're ruined, Jim!"

"That's right, Maria. I've told Heath & Hodges not to contest your suit. I'm sorry I'll have to go so hard with you."

Maria came slowly toward him. Her lips trembled.

"And I—I've told Heath & Hodges not to proceed," she said. "Oh, my dear, my dear, let me comfort you!" She knelt at his side. "Let us forgive each other," she whispered. "When trouble comes whom should I stand by but you? I've failed, too, failed you in my love. I've got what I deserved. Do you remember the—the little flat uptown in the old days? Let's go back and begin all over again. We're young enough—with love."

Sawyer snapped the drawer that held the shining thing into position. He drew his wife into his arms. "Trouble's gone," he answered. "Nothing can ever trouble us again!"

Preparedness. Brother Joe called forward to be baptized.

The person said: "You done been baptized?" "No, no. An' again you come forward to be fold. Ain't dat de truf, dat?" "Has been baptized before!"

"Dat's de truf," said Brother Joe. "How often do you expect to be baptized?" "I don't know," said Brother Joe. "Do often I gets dish mortal clay soaked, de safe. I'll sure be from the sparks on de great day when de world am all on fire. Hallelujah!"
