WALTER PHIPPS FARM

The House of Dreams
By ERNEST LEVINE
(© 1921, Western Newspaper Union.)

Maytown is near New York. It is as old as the Puritans, and some say but this is pretense—it takes its name from the Mayflower. No one would guess at its age from the neat rows of clapboard houses on either side of the long street, unless one took a glance at the old Manor House, back in its maple grove.

A very old house, which has belonged to the Clay family from time immemorial. A mysterious house, for 30 years at least, since old Mr. Clay, the author of profound, queer books became a recluse there. Mysterious even to the tradesmen's boys, who knock at the back door and, eliciting no response, leave their parcels there.

The old, dead housekeeper harshly conated. She, too, was a recluse. Gossip rose and fell in Maytown about the Manor House. What was happening inside it? Who were the visitors who sometimes went there?

Maytown is puritanical, prohibitionist, of course, godly and possessed of a burning hatred for beauty. Beauty and immorality are the two deadly sins. Immorality in Maytown? Rush! Maytown hated the Manor House with a fury that was becoming madness. It hated it for its age, because of the spacious rooms—poor, cramped minds that dwelled in little, ornate parlors with painted furniture, and tiny halls. It hated it because it stood for something which had not been the heritage of all men, a certain freedom, a nobility of life.

It hated old Mr. Clay, who could be seen very rarely seated in his chair upon his porch, among the maples. An old man with a white beard, who wrote queer books about beauty. Novels? Well, a sort of novel, but nobody could understand them.

But—who were the night visitors at the Manor House? Who were the visitors that some people declared they had seen leaving, very early in the morning? Women! Young women! Ah, old Mr. Clay might not be all that he pretended to be!

It was curious, the sort of people who told these tales. There was the child Henry, for instance, a sensitive, dreamy boy, who declared that he had heard music late one night, and seen the windows brilliantly lit up, and a crowd of women in fancy dresses, and a very tall man with the collar of grandfather wore when he sat for his portrait.

And there was old blind Matty, who declared that she had a feeling that there were more people living in the Manor House than any one suspected. They hinted at things to the deaf old housekeeper, but it was impossible to make her understand. She was stone deaf, almost. Nothing to be got out of her.

But more and more the feeling rose against the Manor House. There was a revival on in Maytown. There was a general feeling that the happenings in the Manor House ought to be stopped. Especially after the beautiful young lady in a sort of ermine robe rode away on a white horse at four o'clock in the morning.

Ben Willett ratched for this. He had heard the horse passing his father's house, and had crept out or fects, if plan goes through, a to beautify the roadway with trees and shrubbery.

The commissioners representing the three counties in which the proposed improvements will be made will call meetings of property owners along the route. They will be held October 17, 18 and 19, and Mr. Rogers will urge that the necessary land be given to the state. A meeting will probably be held at Lansing soon to which the commissioners in counties between Lansing and Grand Rapids will be invited, with a view of launching a similar project for the Lansing-Grand Rapids road, although extensive construction work may be undertaken on it next year.

The sense of those attending seemed to be that traffic is running away with the roads and that paved-ways offer the only solution to the traffic problem. M-15 is one of the most heavily traveled trunk lines in the state's highway system. It is impossible to keep gravel on the roads under the heavy usage they are given.

Indications are that the state will undertake to pave and beautify other trunk lines as rapidly as possible.
