

Transcending language barrier was volunteers' big challenge

By MARY GNIEWEK

One of the most frustrating things about his Peace Corps stint in Colombia was Paul Crawford's inability to speak fluent Spanish at staff meetings.

An agricultural economist, the 1967 Farmington High School graduate felt "10 paces out of step" when he wanted to make pointed comments to co-workers at the Colombian Agriculture Institute in Bogota.

Crawford, 31, who studied French rather than Spanish at Farmington High and Michigan State University, managed to weather language problems enough to work 2 1/2 years in Colombia topped off by vacations in Ecuador and Peru.

Recently back from his South American adventure, the former Oakland County Data Processing Department worker is now employed at Development Alternatives Inc., a Washington D.C. based economic consulting firm.

"MY FIELD is international economic development. You can't break into the profession without overseas experience and other languages," Crawford said, explaining his attraction to the Peace Corps, established by President John Kennedy in 1960 to assist developing nations.

"I chose Latin America because Spanish was a basic language," Crawford selected the first South American job assignment available in October, 1977, after earning a master's degree from the University of Wisconsin-Madison in agricultural economics.

At the Colombian Institute, he worked in a report for a journal on a new variety of hybrid corn that proved unsatisfactory with farmers because of its inability to sell.

While in Bogota, Crawford lived in a lower middle class neighborhood with other volunteers.

"It's hard to say if I'd go back to Colombia. Because of my career, no," he said.
