St. Valentine should be going to school these days. Or maybe the patron saint of romance would have more fun staying home and getting regular bulletins on the state of love lives of the young. Like I do.

The reports I receive have high entertainment value, but I must say they require gonstaderable mental dextertity.

"A is going with B." my high schooler will report with excitement. I mention that I had thought A went with C.

"No, that was last week, before C broke off to go with D and E decided he likes F better than B. And X is trying to decide whether to go with Y or E.

In junior high, where they call it going steady and the term seems to mean having a regular escort on tile walk between classes. I heard about a young lady who was developing quite a guilt complex. Problem was she wanted to wear her ring and talk to other boys, too.

Nas site wanted to when the ring and then had regrets. "Something about the pressures of going steady," I was told.

And these official affairs of the heart seem to start earlier and earlier. This year, I've heard of a couple of rings being presented and worn by fifth-graders.

In fact, the language of romance is used by the still younger. I learned that when our youngest came stamping home one day after having a few words with her best friend.

"I'm mad at her." she announced. "This time we're breaking up."
