

Ever read an air cleaner?

Most truck owners do not realize that there are 34 labels listing information on emission controls, certification, fuel and fluid requirements, vehicle specifications and a host of other data.

"Trucks are rolling encyclopedias of automotive information," said Earle Stepp, Chevrolet chief truck engineer.

Many of the labels are concerned with federal controls, and some of them, as well as their placement on and in the truck, are required by law.

For example, the vehicle emission control information label is required by a law that dictates its exact position on the truck (inside front door, placed so print is legible from the front of the truck).

"THE AIR CLEANER" is also good reading," Stepp said. "It has a vehicle emission control (tune-up) label, and a label that lists engine data of manufacturer and the make and displacement."

A label that attracts the most attention from the new truck (or car) buyer is the specifications label, with price, year, model and body style, plus a number of other bits of information.

On some models, the left front window has three labels, which list information on consistent use of limited certification, origin of engine manufacturer and torque converter transmission.

The window may also carry other labels listing price, fuel economy, notice to buyer and mileage accumulations.

"The EPA fuel economy rating label has more than 20 items of information, including the vehicle identification number (VIN), the type of engine, carburetor and transmission, annual fuel cost, average miles per gallon and several 'type' listings such as model, car, truck, class."

The vehicle certification label lists information such as tire pressure, vehicle weight ratings, gross axle weight rating for front and rear, rim and tire sizes and model designations.

INSIDE THE CAB are more labels including the air conditioner compressor label, engine starting procedure and emission control information.

On the instrument panel compartment are service part identification and truck camper loading information labels.

There's even a starting fluid label and auto jack usage label. And, of course, there is a label that tells the type of gasoline to use, or fluid to use, and there is a "glow plug" label for diesels.

For vehicles destined to be exported, there is, naturally, an export label, and for Canadian vehicles, there are special vehicle certification, Canadian safety, cab chassis and reduced tire pressure labels.

If you finally run out of labels to read, open the glove box and you'll find more reading materials—owner's and driver's manual, warranties for parts and tires, maintenance schedule.

4-door Malibu

Chevrolet's 1981 Malibu Classic four-door sport sedan has a redesigned roof line and rear window area. Many power train functions, including the third-gear torque converter clutch in automatic transmissions, are now sported in automatic. A 3.8-liter V6 engine is standard on all models nationwide.
