The bill would provide local public hearings for both the improvement of existing public access lake sites and the delermination of new sites and set procedures for DNR in establishing access lake. It's the latest chapter in Bishop's long battle to halt new public access sites, a move favored by lakeshore property owners and geared to give them maximum political leverage.

Bishop explains it differently: "I would think residents' knowledge of the area, the traffic, the roads and the lake would be considered useful to the DNR in making its determination about where to locate public access sites."
