Continued from Fege 3A "They get to play with it, get some hands on experience." Students who follow up with comput-er programming II next year will learn "Those students should be able to program fairly well," Horner said. Neither Horner nor Jim Cox, the there computer teacher at North, was formally trained in programming. Both attended seminars, read books, and practiced.

Cox also taught seminars to Farm-ington elementary school teachers who have introduced microcomputers to youngsters from kindergarten through fifth grade. "We're just scratching the surface bere," Horner said. "It we get the funds computers have applications to other classes.

The Farmington Board of Education heard a curriculum report Tuesday on the new computer program. "The board of education has been very receptive and as enthusiastic as the staff and kids have been," said Wal-ter Scobie, computer education coordi-nator for the school district.
