

Asthma drug may affect learning temporarily

Many learning problems of children with asthma may be related to medication, and are temporary, according to the American Lung Association of Southeastern Michigan (ALASEM).
Recent results from a three-year study of 94 asthmatic patients aged 9-11 indicated learning and memory problems generally disappeared as steroid medications wore off over a 48-hour period. A Denver researcher, Dr. William M. Sites, found learning problems in children taking prednisone, a steroid, and in children taking both prednisone and theophylline, which is not a steroid. Additional research is underway at the National Jewish Hospital/National Asthma Center to determine whether it is the illness itself, or the drugs, which cause the temporary reduction in learning capacity. Steroids depress the body's production of a natural hormone called ACTH, which appears to enhance learning in laboratory tests. Theophylline, which is closely related to caffeine, affects the central nervous system and may affect cognition, Dr. Sites said.

Medical science is crossing a threshold of important new information about asthma, and the Denver medication studies offer hope for better treatment, ALA medical experts said.
Meanwhile, the American Lung Association is pursuing a different approach for controlling asthma with a new self-help program aimed at young children called "Superstuff." With an activity packed manual for youngsters and an explanatory booklet for parents, the family learns to recognize events that may trigger asthma and to help control the disease through changes in behavior. Some children may learn to get along with less medication. All can learn to get the greatest benefit from their drug treatment.

The "Superstuff" program is available through the American Lung Association's Family Asthma Program, support groups for asthmatic children and their families. The groups meet monthly at six locations in the tri-county area. The meetings feature topics to help asthmatics cope with the problems in everyday living.

ties but cut $18,300 from the areas of senior adult services, Silawase Center, recreation summer centers, San Marino Golf Course and miscellaneous expenses.
A former CETA recreation planner position was converted to the city payroll.
THE FARMINGTON Area Advisory Council, a counseling service, received an extra $14,000 by council action last week. The money will pay for a full-time family counselor. The decision to add that amount increased the boards and commissions budget to a total of $55,274.
"The budget was prepared and by and large accepted by the council," Savage said, "on the basis of the belief that the property taxpayer is receiving an unfair burden as a resident of increasing property evaluations. All this is happening in a period of an economic downturn when they're least able to afford it."
"If I feel badly about anything in this budget," he added, "it would be because many of our capital improvement projects will not be able to be financed."
