Achievers organize

Mensa also is concerned with programs to talented and gifted children. Up to fairly recently, "no attempts to find gifted children had been made," says Werba. "Many times they are far ahead of the other children and sometimes even the teacher."
"The gifted child becomes bored, receives bad grades, and even becomes a trouble-maker. Nobody realizes that the student is a gifted child."
The gifted children then think that they are not intelligent, and end up taking a job that is unchallenging, he says.
"We have a state network for gifted children," Werba says. "The groups work sometimes as a big-brother type organization, or plan activities for gifted children or work with school boards in helping gifted children.

The school systems are set up for the average student, and many times recognition is not given to gifted students, Werba claims.
"Football players are given letters, yet you don't see the A-student getting honored," he says. "The football player is socially recognized, but the gifted student is the one that breaks the (grading) curve for the others."
The gifted children should be given attention, Werba says, since they will be the ones to solve the problems of the future.

Homeowners fight traps

"I can understand people's problems with animals," she said. "But I can think of more humane ways of handling it."
The week following Percy's brush with death, Whiston's husband, Norman, watched a woman beat to death with a shovel a baby woodchuck stuck in a trap in the same vegetable garden.

"Only the state has the authority to control the trapping of wild animals or birds."
The leg traps are commonly used by fur trappers, according to Geilhart. They come as wide as one foot in diameter with teeth in the jaws for catching bears and large game.
The traps must be licensed and tagged with the name and address of the owner, and the animals must be caught during trapping season — which varies according to the animal.
"We don't recommend leg traps for use in gardens," Geilhart said. "We prefer they use live traps."

POLICE WERE CALLED and three traps were confiscated from the backyard of the home on Oakland Street.
But police had to return the traps to the owner after proper licensing was obtained from the state Department of Natural Resources.
"We can't deny its use for people who say animals are doing damage on their property, as long as they dispose of the animals according to DNR regulations," said Jim Geilhart, DNR conservation officer.

Those traps bait the prey with meat, then box it in a small cage without injuring the animal.
Geilhart reasons those traps aren't as popular as leg traps because they're considerably more expensive: $25 as opposed to $3 for leg traps.
