Last weekend marked the end of an-other Detroit Symphony Orchestra con-cert season. Guest conductor Max Rucert season. Guest conductor Max Rudel is among the better artists whose visit here made this season richer. The German-born conductor, now 80, is in the process of winding down his long career, and this was supposed to be his last visit here. He will be missed by the appreciative audience. The program opened with Webers overture "Oberon." Maestro Rudolf's conducting of this short piece was characterized by authentic presentation with balanced, colorful sound. It was performed as an impressive composition, which it is, rather than merely light overture.

work of value and significance.

This was followed by the concerto for cello and orchestra by Robert Schumann. This proved to be the most problematic work of the evening, due to factors that very little can be done about long career, and thus was supposed by the appreciative andence.
