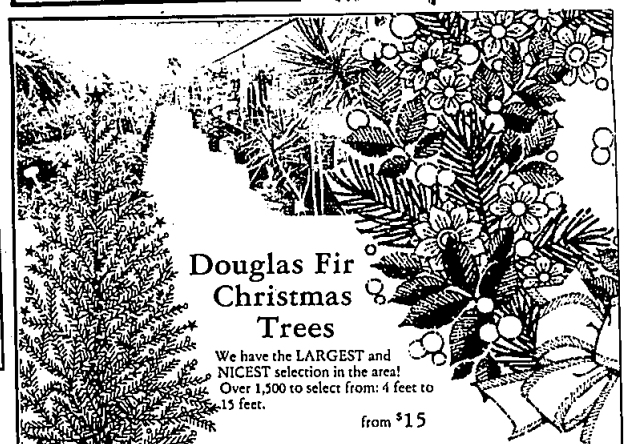
Recognizing Tendinitis

Pain in and about a joint does not necessarily mean you have arthritis; the cause may be tendinitis. The most common sites for tendinitis are the shoulder, elbow and hip. The reason the pain feels 'arthritic' is that tendons are fixed to bone near the joint. When tendinitis occurs, the resulting pain may be close to the joint capsule, thus making it difficult to distinguish the precise point where discomfort originates.

It is important to recognize that tendinitis is present, because it is usually curable. In contrast, most arthritis is difficult to treat, let alone cure.


Tendinitis may respond to heat, rest, and time. If pain persists, you should see a physician to verify the diagnosis and receive further therapy. In some instances a single injection will provide relief; at other times, medication is the treatment of choice. What therapy you receive generally depends on how well you and your physician are able to identify the source of discomfort.
