

Mission Impossible: Self-Destruct Packs

EAST LANSING
Our garbage is piling up. If it is buried, it will pollute the soil and waters. If it is burned, it will pollute the air. What is the answer?

Packaging Professor Harold Raphael at Michigan State University predicts two possibilities. "One approach to improving the disposability of waste," he says, "is to create self-destructing packages. Chemists have already discovered how to make glass decompose into its basic components, and in Germany and Sweden this has been accomplished with plastics. . . .

"It is usually catalyzed by exposing a middle layer of the container to air. Thus, once such a package is open it starts to disintegrate. "So far this approach has not proved too successful nor is it the answer because the components will still add to the pollution problem eventually." The second approach is recycling. Raphael says, "Waste paper can be used in varying proportions to make new paper. Virgin pulp is not always needed. Glass can be ground for reuse and, by melting, aluminum can also be reclaimed."

He emphasizes the main problem is devising a collecting and sorting system that is economical. . . .

"IN SOME PARTS OF the country," Raphael reports, "recycling is being done on an experimental basis and Boy Scouts are being paid a few cents a can to do the collecting. This is not a true picture, because it is on a small scale. It is one thing to have the help of Boy Scouts and another to have to pay road crews to do the collecting. Raphael explains, "recycling is the most practical of the two approaches and forecasts a movement in this direction. He also predicts the development of more easily disposable, less offensive packaging. "I think the design of packaging will change. Less materials will be used and new material will be developed."
