

Administrators Must Do Better Relating School Policy

ANN ARBOR
Public school officials "simply must do a better job" in articulating the basis for controversial student rules and regulations, a University of Michigan law professor told a recent conference for school board members and administrators.

Prof. Joseph R. Julian, associate dean of the U-M Law School and former president of the Ann Arbor Board of Education, said that tension in public schools "can be constructive if it is understood and if one's response to it is not overreaction."

Julian continued: "Part of the problem—and a major part of the problem in seeking to uphold various regulations subjected to scrutiny by the judiciary—is the inability of the school officials adequately to articulate the basis for the regulation or its application to a given case."

Julian spoke on "The Legal Rights and Responsibilities of Public School Students."

HE NOTED THAT the public school student "came into his own, legally speaking," with landmark decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court in two cases called Gault and Tinker after the chief persons involved.

In the former case, the court condemned any punitive action against juveniles which lacks procedural due process. In the latter, involving substantive rights, the court said a student's constitutional rights follow him through the schoolhouse door.

The lesson to be learned from the Tinker case, Julian pointed out, is that "undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough" to overcome the student's constitutional rights.
