PEARLS ARE HARD TO STRING
Requires Year to Learn How to Tie Knot—Craft Handed Down From Mother to Daughter.

One of the "closest" trades in Britain is that of the pearl stringer. This craft is handed-down from mother to daughter, and as the pearls being strung are often of untold value, there is not much of an "open door" for outsiders.

The work is not so easy as it sounds. Indeed, it takes over a year of incessant practice to master the knot that holds each gem in place. It is no ordinary knot, and the pearl stringer has to be able to place it accurately. If it is only one hair's breadth out it will spoil the hang of the necklace.

So the knack of this ancient placing has to be acquired before the worker is allowed to string a pearl. The beehive used is very short and is made of wire as fine as a hair.

The pearl stringer is taught to thread the pearls so that they merely touch each other lightly. If wrongly strung there would either be a gap between the pearls or they would look crowded.—London Answers.

FISH EJECTS ITS VITAL PARTS

Holothurian Known as the "Sea Cucumber" Moves by Tubes Filled With Water.

Among the wonders of nature is the "holothurian" a strange fish that ejects some of its vital parts when captured. If restored to its native element these parts are renewed. The holothurian is popularly called the "sea cucumber" from its resemblance in shape and rough skin to that vegetable. The holothurian moves by tubes which are filled with water, and when distended act as suckers to drag the animal over the bottom. It undergoes a metamorphosis, somewhat like that of the starfish. Before the larva is fully grown, the body of the young holothurian begins to bulge out from the rear side of the larval stomach, and the tentacles begin to grow out. Finally, after the larval body is absorbed the young holothurian sinks to the bottom. A fern living in the South seas at the Falkland Islands carries its young in a sort of nursery where they are densely packed in two continuous fringes adhering to the dorsal tubes.
