

Buyers' Market For Teachers

By TIM RICHARD

Teachers fresh out of college are having a tough time finding jobs, says one Observers-land school district.

Clarenceville Supt. David McDowell finds there's a smaller demand in his district. In addition to the greater supply.

And High School Principal Anthony Marra finds the young prospects are also willing to do more to land a job.

ONE REASON for the greater supply, said McDowell, is that the college graduates of 1970 are the youngsters born in 1947-48, during the post-World War II baby boom.

"About five years ago," he adds, "there was great emphasis on getting more people to go into teaching, and so a lot of students signed up for education schools."

Clarenceville's demand is going down a bit because the birth rate has been leveling and the district itself is "maturing"—there are fewer new homes as the district becomes more nearly built up.

He anticipates about four fewer teachers will be needed for the 1970-71 school year. The turnover is down too, he added. The only teachers leaving are those taking maternity leaves or moving entirely out of the area. Fewer teachers are jumping district lines to seek better conditions.

A FEW YEARS ago, Principal Marra said, a college graduate was interested in teaching only in his major area. Now, he added, during interviews he can ask a prospect his minor areas and increasingly find him willing to teach in that area.

The tight job market forced a drastic change of plans for one woman teacher whose husband was planning to enter Michigan State University. When jobs in the Lansing area appeared tough to get, she stayed with Clarenceville, persuading her husband to commute to Wayne State instead.
