

How Teen Sin Patterns Vary

High school students who are socially deviant in one way tend to be socially deviant in other ways, according to Michigan State University social scientists.

"For example," says Dr. Arthur M. Vener, "if students use drugs, they are more inclined to be more heavily involved in sexual activity, drinking and smoking."

Dr. Vener and Dr. Cyrus Stewart, both MSU social scientists, have completed a 1½ year study of students in three Michigan communities. They were assisted by David L. Hagar, a counselor at Grand Rapids Junior College.

"The schools were 35 miles apart and consisted of one school in an upper middle-class community, one in a middle-class, and one in a stable working-class community," says Dr. Vener.

The study was in the form of a questionnaire designed to show deviancy in the four categories, drinking, smoking, sexual behavior and drug use. A computer was used to analyze the responses, students made to the questions asked.

Large city studies show that a proportionately high percentage of high school students who do use drugs, use "hard" drugs such as heroin, says Dr. Stewart.

"Soft drug-use was more in evidence in the middle communities than in the stable worker's community," says Dr. Vener.

"Some 22% of the high school students in the most affluent community used marijuana at least once," says Dr. Stewart. "This percentage was the highest for any of the communities." This may stem from the fact that the more affluent the student's parents become, the less traditionalistic they tend to be.

"On the other hand," says Dr. Vener, "the degree of sexual activity was higher in the working-class community than in the middle communities."

Dr. Vener also pointed out that the more traditionalistic a high school student is, regardless of community, the more he will shun socially unacceptable behavior.
