charter amendment, Sever said the issue from another angle.

"There's still a lot of questions to be answered on that," said Sever, who has volunteered to serve on any citizens' committee picked to promote such a plan.

With today's attitude toward increased taxes, Sever said, "it's going to be difficult" to sell the charter amendment and accompanying request for 1.5 mills.

"The citizens have not responded to (proposed) tax increases," he said.

Instead, Sever suggested "a gradual change into the capital improvement program. The proposed public building, Sever said, is an example of a project that should be built on a pay-as-you-go basis.

"Like a lot of things in this community, start small and increase," Sever said, adding he would be hard pressed to find a private business expanding overnight from 7,500 square feet to 22,000.

"What do you leave out?" Marks asked, when he said the police building cannot be built in stages.

"This station is going to be built for future growth," Marks said. "We build it all at one time. That's what I propose."

Agreeing with Marks, Anzlovor added that when a building is built in stages, as suggested by Sever, it's often not at the lowest cost possible.

Questioned on how the library system should be funded, only Sever preferred allowing the system to function as a separate entity and to levy its own millage.

"They could be put in a situation where they have to go out and sell what they need to the community," Sever said.

Meanwhile, Sever said the library's current budget, which came under fire weeks ago by Mayor Charles Williams, should remain unchanged.

"The judgement is still out," he said. "There are some people who feel some of the expenses are not justified."

Marks and Anzlovor, on the other hand, prefer continuing the current method of financing through the Farmington and Farmington Hills budgets.

But Sever stated that the library should be given its full one-mill because library administrators have shown they have a good business sense.

When the library's needs demand a change from the current financing system, that's the time to consider allowing it to become independent, Marks added.

"The library may need more. It may need less," Anzlovor said, adding it makes more sense for library administrators to ask council for money than to drum up financial support from the public.

"Essentially, the library got what it asked for," Anzlovor said, referring to the system's 1984-85 budget.

While Anzlovor explained the latest council news to the audience, Sever and Marks touted their particular views of the city's problems.

Never straying far from long from the idea that the public must become more involved in city affairs and projects, Sever also touted the idea that the community is searching for an image.

At one time, Farmington Hills had a small-town image, Sever said. Now with commercial development the city has expanded. City officials, he said, need to involve the public in deciding what direction the city should take, particularly in residential and commercial development.

"I feel the image in our community is changing a great deal," he said. "I think it's important to develop a sound direction for what we want our community to be."

Both Anzlovor and Marks, however, said Farmington Hills already has a good image and that the city has plans for its development.

Development in certain areas, Anzlovor said, was inevitable and city officials were aware of where this would occur which has helped the city's ability to control that development.

"It's a very fine line we have to walk," Anzlovor said, referring to the development of residential and commercial property.

Maintaining "community involvement has already taken place," Marks said, "we know where we're going and how we're going to get there."

I say we do have a plan and we're going in the right direction," he added.

Meanwhile, Marks said partisanship is the biggest problem facing the current council.

"I think what's happening today is we're finding the flavor of partisanship running through the council," Marks said. "I don't think there is any room in this community for partisan politics."

His task, he said, is to make sure that we try to eliminate "the partisan politics that I am seeing on the council."

When asked to explain himself, Marks said that he would like to see a council that discusses ideas rather than "rubber stamps."

Another thing that should change, he said, is the bowing to certain pressure groups at the expense of needed projects.

The terms liberal and conservative shouldn't be bandied about when council is in discussion or about to make a decision, Marks said. In addition, he said, it's unnecessary to hear about council members' political affiliations.

While Anzlovor admitted that council members have used the terms liberal and conservative, it hasn't been in association with a political party.

"I don't think we have made what I consider partisan politics," Anzlovor said.

Instead of calling it partisan politics, Sever said that what's happening on council is a simple case of "people doing things from their feelings and attitudes."

"It's not partisan. It's personal feelings and that's what we have on council," he said.

"I think it's unreasonable... n. that they would get elected to a position and all of a sudden change their view points," Sever continued, referring to council members.

TALKING WITH YOUR DOCTOR ABOUT ARTHRITIS

If you want to gain the most from your doctor's appointment, it is a good idea to have clearly in mind the questions you would like the doctor to address. "How much will the treatment cost?" or, "What activities can I undertake, and which should I avoid?" or, "What type of arthritis do I have and what is its long term outlook?" are appropriate concerns. Bringing them to the doctor's attention will likely result in a straight forward reply on your physician's part. It is worthwhile to write your questions and present them to the doctor. Doing so helps both of you to focus on your needs and promotes efficient use of the time set aside for your appointment. Feel free to ask the doctor to put his explanations and instructions in writing. Written information provides you a ready reference and gives others with whom you live and work, the chance to learn about your arthritis, its problems, and its care.

Fireworks bigger than ever

In the air producing a burst 200 to 300 feet in diameter.

"I usually save about six of the eight-inch shells for towards the end of the show because they are the most spectacular to view," says Megregan.

He has scheduled an impressive grand finale of 200 three-inch shells all to be shot off within 15 to 20 seconds.

Megregan has been freeloading fireworks shows for the past six years, doing shows in Flint, Bloomfield and Farmington.

In everyday life Megregan is a design engineer for the Chrysler Corp. He says his freeloading and sale and manufacture of fireworks is "just a sideline."

"It's fascinating," he said. "I really get a bang out of it."

But there is no joking when Megregan talks about fireworks safety.

"To me, safety is a number one concern, both for the people doing the show and, more importantly, for the people watching," he said.

AS PART of his safety precautions, Megregan and his helpers wear flame retardant clothing, safety glasses, safety helmets and long-sleeved shirts.

Another precaution taken is to provide a fall-out area for the shells which is away from any spectators.

"We aim the shells to go up in the sky at the same place. This spot in the sky is directly over a safety zone so any debris or a dud, for instance, falls in that zone," said Megregan.

The Farmington Hills Police Department handles crowd control so people will keep an appropriate distance from where the shells are fired. The fire department will also have a fire truck at the site to take care of any fires which might start.

"We want to provide as much fun and entertainment in as safe an environment as possible," said Megregan.

All fuses on the fireworks have a safety cap, and the shells are launched from mortars (tubes) buried in the ground for safety.

The Federal Government requires all persons involved with the manufacture and handling of fireworks to be licensed. Megregan has obtained this license in addition to a permit issued by the city of Farmington to use fireworks in the city.

Yet Megregan feels stricter regulations are necessary at the state level.

"There is no state licensing for fireworks operators," he said. "I think it would be a good idea."

"People who handle fireworks should be able to demonstrate proficiency and safety in the handling of fireworks," he said.

"You have to respect fireworks, you can't screw up — not even one time," Megregan said.

The Founders Festival fireworks display is scheduled for 10 p.m. Saturday, July 11, at OCC's Orchard Ridge Campus.

The rain date for the event is July 22 at the same time, but Megregan says the fireworks will probably go as scheduled unless there are "torrential rains."

The show is scheduled to last 25 to 30 minutes.
