Kids need to know about moving

Parents should include their children in decisions concerning a relocation. According to Sidney Epstein, president of Atlas Van Lines, by allowing your children to express their opinion, you'll increase their interest in the move and help them feel like an important part of family decisions.

"Parents must be sensitive to the needs of their children when relocating," Epstein said. "Walk them through every step of a move. Ask them what they think of the new house and neighborhood and take their feelings into consideration."

He suggests the following hints when preparing your children for a move:

- Explain the move to your children and be honest and thorough in your explanation of why you are moving. They will be apprehensive about the new community and reluctant to leave their friends. This is the time to calm any fears and help them develop a positive attitude about the move.

- If possible, plan to move during the school year, so that your children will have a chance to make new friends before the summer vacation starts. Summer creates abnormal neighborhood patterns since many children often vacation away from home or go away to camp. A normal school year routine provides classmates and activities.

- Before your move takes place, familiarize your children with the new neighborhood. Take them along for a stop at the grocery store or visit a neighborhood park.

- Preparing your child for the actual moving day is important. To help keep the day running smoothly, Epstein suggests the following tips:

- Pack a "kid's box," including toys, games, coloring books, crayons, favorite stuffed animals or anything that will entertain, reassure and comfort the child on the trip.

- Include in your first-aid kit band-aids, aspirin, cough syrup, anti-diarrhea medication, travel sickness preventive, a thermometer and any special medication your child might need.

- When traveling with infants, take prepackaged, ready-to-use formulas and strained infant foods in jars, neither of which would require refrigeration or sterilization. Remember the disposable diapers, towels, tissues and premoistened, sealed wetwipes.

- Set aside time each day to find out how your child is adjusting to his new environment. After the settling-in period is over, take the time to plan a few extra family activities in the new neighborhood.
