A computer everyone can use

"AS COMPUTER technology gets more and more advanced, we're going to see smaller computers that can do a lot more," said Cliff Bream, director of marketing for Epson America Inc., manufacturer of the Geneva portable computer. "This is a real advantage for people who need a small, powerful, versatile machine."

Part of the versatility to look for when buying a computer is its ability to increase memory capacity and expand its capabilities as your computer needs expand.

Such computers limit the financial risk for people who are unsure of their future computer needs. Bream said. These people will not be forced to guess at the functions they'll want to use several years from now. They won't possibly have to spend a lot of money to replace a too-small computer when they find they guessed incorrectly.

INSTEAD THESE people can have a machine to which they can add a variety of attachments as they determine their needs. And they can wait to add the attachments until they can afford them, rather than buying them all at once in one big, expensive package.

A sign for portable computers. Bream
