

Golden eagles watch for prey while riding trains, then spread their wings to take off after a food animal.

Eagles adapt — hunt from trains

By Timothy Nowicki
special writer

SOME forms of wildlife adapt easily to the encroachment of man and the alteration of the environment.

Many species of birds still breed and remain in urban and suburban areas. In fact, the house sparrow, which was introduced to America from Europe, has proliferated in urban areas to the point of being a pest.

Fox, skunk, raccoon and opossum are able to survive in urban areas because of their generalized diet. Man, intentionally or unintentionally, provides adequate food for these animals to live on.

WILDLIFE has adapted well to many man-made objects too. Birds frequently use telephone lines, television antennas, bird feeders and even artificial nesting platforms.

I recently became aware of an interesting adaptation to man-made devices that I found ingenious. In such western states as Montana and Utah, trains traverse the countryside, providing passage through undeveloped lands. In these and other western states, the golden eagle, first cousin to the bald eagle, hunts for jackrabbits, squirrels and other medium-sized animals.

Normally, eagles soar high and search for unsuspecting prey below. When prey is located, they partially fold their wings and plummet to the ground to capture it.

Some eagles, though, have discovered another efficient way of hunting. They ride the trains. Birds perch on top of moving trains and search for prey that is chased away from the tracks by the oncoming train.

nature

When prey is spotted, the eagle simply spreads its wings, and the momentum of the moving train bullets the eagle toward its target.

MAN-MADE objects can be used effectively by wildlife at times, but there are also many things that interfere with natural processes. High transmission towers and their guide wires can be deadly to migrating birds.

On stormy nights with low cloud cover, migrating song birds like thrushes, warblers and flycatchers fly much lower in altitude than on clear nights. They fly at night because they need the daylight hours in which to feed.

Flying low on stormy nights, coupled with the hypnotic effect of constant glowing warning lights on these towers, puts the birds on a collision course. Just last month 300 to 400 birds were killed at local transmission towers in one night.

Birds and all other animals have developed ways of surviving in the natural world, but the recent appearance of man-made objects has made some things dangerous and others advantageous.

Unemployment rises as summer jobs end

The end of summer jobs pushed Michigan's seasonally adjusted unemployment rate up to 10.8 percent in September, said Richard Simmons Jr., director of the Michigan Employment Security Commission (MESC).

Simmons said 474,000 workers in the state were jobless last month, up 29,000 from August. September's level is virtually unchanged from a year ago, when jobless rate was 11 percent with 479,000 out of work.

"Much of the increase in unemployment resulted from the loss of summer jobs as many of the state's recreational and tourism activities began closing down for the season," Simmons said.

Michigan's labor force increased a slight 9,000 to 4,351,000. Women re-entering the work force accounted for much of the increase.
