

Cast excels but 'play' lacks any real purpose

Performances of the Meadow Brook Theatre production of "84 Charing Cross Road" by Helene Hanff, adapted by James Roose-Evans, continue through Sunday, Feb. 23, on the Oakland University campus in Rochester Hills.

"84 Charing Cross Road" really isn't a play. It is an intriguing character study of Helene Hanff, an American writer with a fetish for old books and a forthright, witty way of expressing herself in letters. The Meadow Brook production does well by this collection of letters that never quite makes it as a play despite an expert cast and fine staging.

The script is entirely structured around reading letters aloud — some 20 years of trans-Atlantic correspondence in the guise of book orders between Hanff and a stiffly correct seller of antique books in London, one Frank Doel.

Director David Regal skillfully handles the constantly shifting focus of the action from the New York side of the stage to the London side at 84 Charing Cross Road, offices of Marks & Co. Booksellers.

Action in the "play" is inconsequential. Except for Hanff shuffling from typewriter to bookshelf to scruffy sofa, she doesn't really do anything much except talk. Thank heavens, Jeanne Arnold as Helene talks well, because the entire play depends on hooking the audience with the wit and intelligence of her personality. Arnold pulls it off partly because she's so adept at bringing out every nuance of humor in the letters, which change hardly at all over the years spanned by the play.

HER HELENE is a big, frizzy-haired spinster with a robust way of talking that belies the loneliness of her life. Her friends, for the most part, are the great minds of history — from Roman historians through the 18th-century poets and essayists. That's not bad company, except for the fact that they're all long dead. She spends her days alone, cranking out Ellery Queen scripts and docu-dramas for television and schlepping around her one-room New York apartment in baggy slacks and tennis shoes or robe and slippers. She reads and cherishes books and writes letters to Frank Doel.

On this side of the Atlantic, the action is scarcely more dramatic. People move from desk to bookshelf and back again, occasionally making the little bell jingle when they go out the door.

Doel is supposed to be a terribly English fellow, restrained and proper but underneath a basic good chap. Will Love, as Frank, comes off as a good chap although he doesn't sound terribly English. The bookshop people (Barbara Barringer, Liz Zwelfer, Eric Johnson, Paul Hopper and Wayne David Parker) tell bits and pieces of what's going on in their lives as they move books around in the charming bookshop set, which is brighter and airier than the description of it.

Director David Regal does well at manufacturing movement for the sake of movement and making us care about the plebian lives of the nice people who work in the bookshop during the years of Helene's and Frank's correspondence. Still, it must be a challenge making a play out of an autobiographical character sketch that was better off as a book.

This is an old-fashioned play, older even than the timely mentions of Churchill and the coronation of Elizabeth II or Ellery Queen mysteries on early American television.

"84 CHARING Cross Road" makes old-fashioned assumptions. For one, it takes a classical education for granted and assumes that people know Catullus, have read Samuel Pepys' diary and know the Latin Vulgate.

Those not hooked on books may find the play tedious because every letter centers on Frank's and Helene's shared love of fine leather-bound editions of classic literature. Helene spends an inordinate amount of time clutching one book or another to her breast and rhapsodizing about it. What's more, the books are all classics — old classics.

Modern playgoers who cut their teeth on television and think Hemingway is a classic writer are bound to miss many references. To Helene, Hemingway is an upstairs who borrowed the title "For Whom the Bell Tolls" from her favorite genius, John Donne.
