Washington, D.C. — places to visit

Many families are looking forward to traveling and exploring some of our own beautiful country this summer. If you happen to go to Washington, D.C., there are many interesting areas to visit, depending on your personal interest.

I have been there many times and have found that you can become an adventurer and always find new worlds to conquer in Washington, D.C.

Because I'm a gardener, I enjoy visiting Dunbarton Oaks. It would be advisable to telephone or write ahead when you wish to go there. Dunbarton Oaks is a private estate, given to Harvard University for the purpose of attracting garden scholars from all over the world.

THE GROUNDS are beautiful, the private library is a gem for those who write in the field of horticulture. On the grounds are many specimens of espaliered magnolia grandiflora. There are many levels to the gardens and up one staircase there is wisteria with guide wires to direct its growth.

Of course if you haven't been to Monticello, which isn't far from Washington, D.C., do consider going there and seeing the many ideas Thomas Jefferson developed in the operation of his home.

We, Americans, savor our beautiful country and this is an appropriate time to explore our National Parks throughout our boundaries. The grandeur of the mountains and the serenity of the lakes all across this country provide endless choices for the traveler. You will enjoy studying Rand McNally's National Park Guide by Michael Frome. This publication is so well done in exquisite colors that you will find it provides an appetizing trip for you.

TAKING YOU back to Birmingham — If you are having soil problems on your "back 40," here are a couple of tips that will help you out. If your soil is too sandy add leaves and peat moss so that water will be retained by the soil and assist your plants in growth.

If your soil has too much clay break it up by sharp sand which comes out of the earth and not a lake, then add some humus. For this last problem I would really turn over the soil with a fork or spade.

If you have a tree whose bark needs protection you can get a roll of Ross Tree Guard at the hardware store which is easy to apply. Good care of the trees on your property is a good investment for the future.

and lecturing. Stump was commissioned by Providence Hospital to create an indoor wall relief and an eight-foot sculpture series for the courtyard. She is working on a sculpture, "Jane: An Homage to Duchamps," for the Cranbrook Kingswood courtyard.

Her work, "Ghost," is being shown by the National Association of Women Artists in New York City's Jacob Javits Building.

Sculptor honored

Cranbrook Kingswood sculpture teacher Pamela Stump is one of five Michigan artists featured in the new publication, "Contemporary American Women Sculptors," by Virginia Watson-Jones, Oryx Press, Phoenix, Ariz., 1986.

Included in the feature is a biographical description and a photograph of her work and various points of exhibition.
