Is Morality A Public Need?

A popular myth about public education is that the inability of schools to teach morality restricts the instruction of other subjects.

The myth that schools cannot teach morality probably started with the Supreme Court and gained more believers after the Supreme Court's Bible ruling.

For awhile the issue seemed to die, but the myth is alive again with current debates about parochial and sex education.

IT IS NOT true, and never has been, that public schools cannot teach morality.

Indeed, public schools MUST teach morality and would be limited greatly in the classes offered if morality were a taboo.

Separation of church and state has been a sound principle since this nation was founded and is deeply embedded not only in the Constitution but in a lengthy backlog of court cases.

But the separation has always been that public schools cannot teach religious doctrine. The history of the separation doctrine makes very clear that a difference exists between religious and morality-between sect and secular.

First, let us recognize that secular does not mean godless. The requirement that public schools be secular does not demand that all instruction assume the non-existence of a supreme being.

The requirement simply insists that instruction does not include any specific description of the supreme being—his nature, relationship to man, expectations of man, or other descriptions which differ among sects.

Do you plan to stain a fence or the house siding? Some colors weather better than others. In wood tones, yellow-brown, gray-brown and black-brown stains are preferable to the red-browns, which often turn purplish.

Those who BELIEVE the myth should recognize that the ultimate purpose of public education is not to produce scholars or saints.

The purpose of American public education is to produce sound American citizens. Public tax funds are not invested to generate geniuses but to produce graduates who will become productive citizens for our nation.

A.D. Mayo, a noted educator, has said: "Schools do not train souls for eternity but undertake to keep America out of hell by educating children into a virtuous citizenship."

John Dewey once wrote: "The teacher is always the prophet of the true God and the usher in of the true Kingdom of God."

PUBLIC EDUCATION in this country must include moral instruction.

How can a civics teacher relate democracy without discussing the inherent right of an individual? Can psychology be taught without reference to the principles of the Golden Rule and Second Great Commandment?

Can family living be taught in a moral vacuum? Can the lessons of world or American history be learned without reference to basic moral principles?

If morality were removed entirely from public schools, the curriculum would be limited to subjects as French, Latin, Greek, math, applied music (but not appreciation) and finger painting.

Certainly we could not allow literature because moral reference is required to explain literature. We have a large red "A."

IN FACT, the very purpose of education as defined by a wide cross-section of educational philosophers demands that morality be included in instruction.

An experimental-realist, for instance, suggests that our values, knowledge and experience undergo change. The challenge to education, then, is whether students undergo change under completely hazardous conditions or under conditions directed by intelligence.

The classical-realist view expressed by Harry Broudy is "If we could apprehend natural law, if we could only discern the form of human nature, we would have an insight into the goals and standards appropriate for the good life."

Those holding the life-adjustment view says education has two elements: first to help students develop site skills, knowledge and basic attitudes basic to dealing with immediate situations of everyday living; and second, at the same time, to help students understand the persistent aspects of the situation which recur throughout life.

Those recurring situations include: keeping well, under-
