Reaction to rowdy teens is recounted

Sgt. Charles Nebus recently told a gathering of Oakland County police and probate court officers about how Farmington Hills tackled the problem of fragmented youth gangs.

Nebus — in charge of the Farmington Hills Police Department's juvenile section — was asked to speak about concerns, trends and ordinances in the wake of the teen rowdiness that occurred along northern Orchard Lake Road in January.

"We shared ideas about ways to prevent and control common problems," said Nebus, also a member of Farmington Hills' Committee for the Prevention of Teenage Delinquency.

Nebus discussed Farmington Hills' curfew laws for minors and the city's tough loitering ordinance. He also discussed special enforcement procedures — "the use of increased police patrols and whether officers should be uniformed or in plainclothes."

Police and probate court officers have met regularly for the past year, meetings Nebus called very productive. The meetings provide an opportunity to keep abreast of juvenile procedures and laws.

"They've brought uniformity to procedures and to our way of thinking," Nebus said. "The juvenile code is so gray sometimes that neighboring departments had been interpreting laws and procedures differently."

Farmington Hills apparently is gaining a reputation in the Detroit area for its approach to combating teen rowdiness.

"I've gotten calls from mayors, council members, school principals and police in several other cities, asking about the types of enforcement procedures — 'the types of ordinances we use,'" Nebus said.
