

Pinch petunias to encourage buds Larger site chosen for season's finale

Do you recall the childhood song that begins "There Stands a Little Man 'Neath the Great Oak Tree"?

It always reminds me of a fascinating plant in my tiny wildflower area, jack-in-the-pulpit. It seems as though it grows several inches overnight. The plant can reach a height of three feet. Some of its relatives are the skunk cabbage — that earliest harbinger of spring — sweet flag, green dragon and a tropical relative, the philodendron.

The leaves, one or two per plant, are broad and shaped like a pointed trefol. The hooded pulpit is formed by a part of the plant called a spathe. The ones in my garden are green with purple stripes, although some of them are solid green.

In the center of this pulpit stands jack, a candle-shaped spike. The flowers that are clustered at the base of jack can be either male or female. The amount of food stored in the corn determines the gender of the new plants.

The bright red berries that can be seen in late summer are borne on stiff succulent stalks. They are well-loved by the birds. Isn't nature wonderful?

Now that petunias have been planted for summer color, it is recommended that you pinch all the flowers to stimulate maximum branching. If the temperatures were already above 70 degrees when the plants were put in the ground, they should be pinched often. Pinching is the removal of young shoots, which will encourage the development of buds.

Pinch again in early summer, cutting back each stem 3-4 inches above the soil line. In about two weeks, flowers will again be plentiful. As temperatures become cooler later in the summer, cut back the older stems to force more branching and flowering.

After pinching, the beds should be fertilized. Petunias like to be well watered by applying the water beneath the blooms. If water touches the blooms they tend to close up for several days.

The final concert of the Chamberworks' debut season will be held at the Central Woodward Christian Church, Adams at Big Beaver, Troy at 8 p.m. Friday.

This marks a departure in location. The group's other five concerts were held at the Bell Art Center of Troy. All were sold out well in advance. More room will be available for this concert, which is titled "Voices and Instruments in Concert."

Thomas Kuras, harpsichord, is artistic director. Other members are
