USING TWO DRUGS IN RHEUMATOID ARTHRITIS

What is your choice if aspirin or a similar anti-inflammatory drug cannot control your rheumatoid arthritis?

One alternative is to stop your current medication and begin another anti-inflammatory medication. A second choice is to continue aspirin and add a medicine from the group known as disease-modifying-drugs: gold, penicillamine, plaquenil, methotrexate, or azulfadine.

Aspirin type of medications work by inhibiting the production of a chemical, prostaglandin, that stimulates inflammation. The disease-modifying-drugs work by other means: they prevent white blood cells from continuing the wave of inflammation already begun by prostaglandins. The two classes of drugs achieve more than either one can alone, because each medication attacks a different aspect of inflammation.

Because of their possible toxicity to bone marrow, liver, and kidney cells, disease-modifying-drugs are not used routinely for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis. Before your doctor can prescribe these drugs, he must be certain that they are needed, and that you, after being informed of their possible side-effects, give approval for their use.
