

Enjoying Music Study Subject Of New Book

ANN ARBOR
"Teaching Rhythm and Using Classroom Instruments," by Marguerite V. Hood, University of Michigan professor music, has been published by Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, N.J.

It is part of the series, "Foundations of Music Education Series," of which Allen P. Britton, acting dean of the U-M School of Music, is editor. The new, 142-page book ($6.95 or $2.95 paperback) demonstrates how to achieve greater enjoyment in the study of music. Its natural approach to rhythm improves music teaching and stimulates musical curiosity for the student.

The book's unique coverage is not limited to rhythm instruments. The use of a wide variety of instruments is discussed, including xylophone, piano, recorder and guitar to mention only a few.

THOUGH WRITTEN for classroom use, the ideas and examples should benefit individual instruction as well. The book shows how the study of rhythm and music notation is made considerably easier by using classroom instruments. This technique achieves understanding through action and play-learning by hearing, doing and discovery rather than rote memorization.

The book is divided into two parts: "Teaching Rhythm in the Elementary School" and "Using Classroom Instruments in the General Music Program." The sequence proceeds from suggestions on bodily movement and dance to playing rhythm instruments, recognizing rhythm patterns and an introduction to notation.

The discussion of rhythm instruments devotes much attention to folk and national instruments-American Indian, Latin American, African, Japanese, Hawaiian, Arabias, etc. Chapters are also devoted to tuned bar and keyboard instruments, small wind instruments and stringed instruments.

Of particular importance is the variety of musical materials and suggested activities included in the book.

A practical guide, it offers the instructor a step-by-step program that is not only easy to understand but a delight to communicate to children.
