Enjoy insect-free outdoor living with enclosed porch

HOMEOWNERS who enjoy outdoor living are returning to an old-fashioned solution to the problem of moths and mosquitoes — screen-enclosed porches and decks.

Decks have become the nationwide center for entertaining and outdoor living; and porches are making a strong comeback. But in most parts of the country biting insects often limit the use of both porches and decks, particularly after dark.

An easily constructed screened enclosure offers an economical solution to the problem.

Enclosing your porch or deck with easy-to-install aluminum or fiber glass screening extends your living space outdoors at minimum cost. You'll have an outdoor living room that's light and airy by day, and lets in pleasant evening breezes without annoying flying insects.

Housekeeping is easier, too. A screened enclosure keeps out wind-blown leaves and debris all year round. And since the screening reduces ultraviolet transmission, there's less fading of furniture and fabrics.

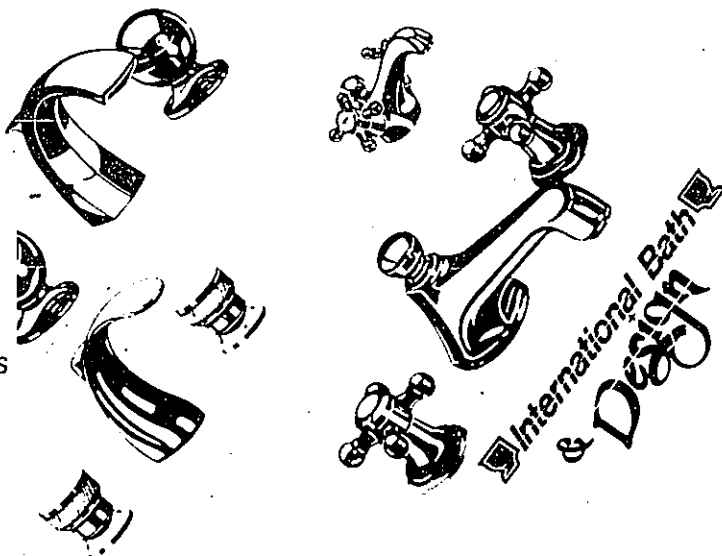

ALUMINUM AND FIBER glass screening is available in rolls in both conventional and solar weaves at hardware, home center and building supply stores. Solar screening blocks about 70 percent of the sun's rays, and can be used where you want protection from the sun.

If you're enclosing a porch, insect screening can be installed with simple framing. For a deck, you'll probably want to construct a permanent roof so that wet weather doesn't drive you indoors.

For a folder that illustrates both contemporary and traditional porch and deck designs, send a postcard to Insect Screening Weavers Association, Post Office Box 1291, Pittsburgh, Pa. 15230.
