

Herbig conducts Beethoven for final concert

By Avigdor Zorom special writer

In the final concert of his six-year tenure as music director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Gunther Herbig was true to the repertoire he has favored from the beginning.

His emphasis on the traditional European, mostly German classical legacy, was illustrated in this final program which featured Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth symphonies. While the narrowness of Herbig's repertoire has been the target of much criticism, one could hardly argue with the masterful nature of such selections, even if some of them, such as Beethoven's Ninth, were performed here too often in the last six years.

That Beethoven's Eighth lies in the shadow of the Ninth comes as no surprise. Yet, this is no reason for an unconditional surrender. Indeed, the performance of the first movement suggested a great deal of vitality and sparkled with enthusiasm.

Three elements distinguished, however, as the performance progressed. The few wrong notes in the minuet were among the less invidious flaws — accidents happen even to the best performers.

THE OVERALL APPROACH suggested some gradual development with the charming work. There is always the danger of not taking Beethoven seriously enough, but another, less obvious danger, is in taking him too seriously and too literally.

That was the case with the final movement in the Eighth which, in its code, is full of humor and mischief, yet it was presented so rigidly that even the extreme changes in rhythm didn't offer relief from a sense of strict metronomic tempo.

Humor and levity are less associated with the Ninth.

But, a Scherzo has some of these elements in it by definition and the one in the Ninth is no exception. Thus, when attempting to start the trio a second time, Beethoven cuts it off abruptly with a confident conclusion, saying, in effect, "No, not this again — I've had enough."

Concluding the movement at the regular tempo, as it was on this occasion, totally misses the point. This, however, was an exception to an otherwise excellent performance of this Beethoven and repertoire.

This performance benefited from the outstanding contributions of Faye Robinson, soprano; Susanne Mentzer, mezzo soprano; John Alaola, tenor; and Gary Relyea, baritone. The Detroit Symphony Chorus directed by Eric Freudenman, completed this excellent group.

Herbig had a forceful, commanding tone that was marginally obscured by vibrato in the lower range. Robinson's intense voice soared above the rest of the singers, sometimes being overwhelming. Its passion wasn't a substitute for clarity and the high level of discipline required.

MENTZER AND ABSALOM provided fine balance between the two extremes. Above all, the voices of these four singers blended well harmonically, without some of the clashes of intonation that are often present.

The well-coordinated Detroit Symphony Chorus which shifted emphasis smoothly and naturally, kept this performance at a consistently high level.

The prolonged, applause and standing ovation by the sellout audience made us forget for a while the discouraging realities of the artistic world.

This was brought home by an insert in the program about the problems of the National Endowment for the Arts; NEA, which is under attack by critics who favor its elimination.
