Where did all the creatures go?

Walking trails in Autumn reveals a marked contrast from the same area in summer. Hidden leaf pigments show their colors. Few, if any insects are seen. Turtles, frogs and snakes are nowhere to be seen. Even familiar birds are gone from their perches.

When one considers the extreme contrast between the 90 degree temperature of summer and the sub-zero temperatures of winter, it is remarkable that animals, other than man, can survive such extremes for such long periods of time.

An alien from outer space walking caves in winter would think the area was devoid of life. Yet when it returned again in spring it would find a myriad of life forms that suddenly appeared.

Where did the snakes, turtles, frogs, insects, and birds come from? Well, some birds stay in the area all year, while other species migrate.

nature
Timothy Nowicki

Snakes, however, cannot migrate and thus must adapt to the extreme climatic conditions encountered in our area. In fall, some garter snakes find traditional group wintering huddles together to stay warm. Staying warm is only relative, since they are all about the temperature of the surrounding air.

Some individuals find deep rock crevices to shelter themselves from the cold. Other species of snakes find protection in the underground burrows of animals.

Insects remain inconspicuous during cold temperatures in a variety of forms. Some pass the winter as eggs, such as grasshoppers. Lady-bird beetles are an example of an insect that seeks shelter in the adult form and will remain that way until spring. Aquatic insects like dragonflies, have immature stages that exhibit reduced activity in unfrozen water of lakes and streams. Representatives of butterflies and moths pass the winter in the pupal stage — cocoon or chrysalis.

Frogs and turtles that spend most of their time in the water will bury themselves in the mud. Painted turtles and snapping turtles can be active in the water beneath the ice, but their activity is greatly reduced compared to that of summer.

Contrasting activity cycles throughout the year allow us to reflect on the amazing adaptations that have enabled animals to survive.
